About the show

Physicist. Inventor. Activist.

It's time to meet the most significant British scientist you've never heard of, born just 20 miles away from here.

Follow Hertha Ayrton and four of her groundbreaking friends as they study at 1880s Girton College, Cambridge.

When fire threatens their College, Hertha gathers an unlikely crew to start the world's first all-female fire brigade. Struggling against the elements – and sexism – in Cambridge, they soon realise there's a bigger blaze to fight: for their right to equal education, to work, and to vote.

Even if it means starting a few fires themselves...

Bass

Poppy Edwards

Poppy is a bassist and musician with a love for groove, live performance and all things bass. Currently studying music at Solent University, she has developed a versatile playing style influenced by everything from pop and funk to rock and musical theatre.

Taking inspiration from players such as Marcus Miller and Joe Dart, Poppy is drawn to bassists with a strong groove and loves finding the balance between supporting a song and adding her own personality to it. For her, the best part of playing bass is locking in with the musicians around her and becoming part of something bigger on stage.

With ambitions of becoming a professional session bassist, Poppy hopes to build a career performing and recording with a variety of artists. She's thrilled to be joining the band for Fire brigade!

We'd like to thank...

Mayflower Studios and the British Science Festival for their generous support. They have enabled us to create this new concert version of the show here in Southampton, and tell the story of Hertha that started only 20 miles away from where we're sitting right now. The Mayflower and British Science Association teams have been exceptional all week!

We'd also like to thank Birmingham Hippodrome, Lincoln Arts Centre, University of Lincoln, Institute of Physics and the British Society for History of Science. Their support has been a vital part of the show's development over the last few years.

Eternal thanks go to our creative champions Clare Chandler, Tim Sutton, Victoria Saxton and Tricity Vogue. We wouldn't have found our brilliant cast without advice from Teddy Clements and Kevin Jones - Southampton is lucky to have these champions of new musical theatre!

Writers

Jenni, Helen and Brian came together in 2023 to write new musicals that shine a spotlight on history, science and trailblazing women.

Jenni Pinnock weaves stories, nature and science into music which is regularly performed both across the UK and around the world. Quirky time signatures and soaring melodies are punctuated by moments of quiet stillness and reflection, in projects that span from solo works to large scale collaborations across the arts. Working in both the contemporary classical and musical theatre worlds, her music can be found in student recitals, installed in replica Antarctic huts, in concert halls and on theatre stages.

Helen Arney is a songwriter, science comedian and recovering stand-up. You might have seen her explaining physics while riding a rollercoaster for BBC2, electrifying Sandi Toksvig on QI, singing the periodic table on Channel 4 News or touring with science comedy phenomenon “Festival of the Spoken Nerd”. She now writes musical theatre projects that often put complex women and science centre-stage. Helen’s great grandfather, Edgar Walford Marchant, knew Hertha Ayrton and was taught by her husband.

Brian Mackenwells is an Irish writer living in Oxford. Despite being quite tired, he has written for the BBC about pencils, told stories on stage about not getting sick in zero gravity, performed standup comedy about strange superheroes, and published children’s poetry. He spent five years co-writing a monthly audio drama “Action Science Theatre”. This multi award-entering podcast released 50 very silly adventure stories, including a live show, and was downloaded over 75,000 times.

Hertha Ayrton: A Portrait in Three Protests

One of the central driving forces behind our version of the show's main character, Hertha, is her powerful sense of justice. She has to do the right thing, whatever the cost. First she feels compelled to form a fire brigade to protect her new friends, then later in the show she starts a campaign for women at Cambridge to be awarded the same degrees as male students.

Taking on these all-consuming projects causes Hertha to sacrifice her health, her academic goals, and her family's hopes... but she does it anyway, because it's the right thing to do.

The real Hertha Ayrton also strived for justice. Here are three moments of protest from her life that helped us create our version of her on stage:

1. HUNGER STRIKES

Hertha's biographer Evelyn Sharp describes a time at school when Hertha was accused of some misbehaviour that she wasn't responsible for, but the teachers refused to believe her. To prove it, she came up with the idea of a hunger strike: "For two-and-a-half days she came to every meal but steadily refused to touch food, until, both alarmed and convinced against their will of her innocence, her harassed elders had to give in and concede her point."

2. BLACK FRIDAY AND WOMEN'S RIGHT TO VOTE

Hertha was a committed member of the Women's Social and Political Union, the militant suffrage organisations behind the notorious "Black Friday" march on Parliament. Although she was never arrested herself, Hertha planned her scientific work around a possible spell in prison. Her biographer writes: "Mrs. Ayrton's participation in the militant demonstrations of November, 1910, led to the postponement of her paper, 'On some new Facts connected with the Motion of Oscillating Water' as she fully expected to be in prison on November 21, the date on which she had engaged to read it before the Royal Society."

3. MARIE CURIE AND MISINFORMATION

Hertha met fellow scientist, and discoverer of the element Radium, Marie Skłodowska-Curie, at the Royal Institution in June 1903. Marie sent Hertha an autographed copy of her PhD thesis on Radioactivity, and they became firm friends for 20 years until Hertha's death.
